stages of the visitation. Without Government assistance, indeed, the probability is that the Congress would assume the character of a local gathering, whose conclusions would be informal and weak. But the authoritative character which they might possess if they are to influence scientific opinion. The realization of such a Congress should rest with the Government of India, and that Government should charge itself with the bearing of institutions to other countries to be represented at it, also with the task of indicating the general line of inquiry. The task would be by no means a light one, and we trust that the authoritativeness of the Medical Department a few months ago, there should be no difficulty in finding both the means and the men necessary for the work. We should, certainly, be behind other countries if we allowed the occasion to pass by without making arrangements for deriving from it all the lessons, both practical and scientific, which the experience of the last eighteen months is capable of yielding. The German Government had not anything like us vital and direct a claim upon them to organize a congress on leprosy; the Government of India have to organize a plough congress. That is the main point. The result of our approach would be in part what off if next year a congress could be convened in Bombay under Government auspices to gather up all that is valuable in the experience of the last year and a half. The subject is one in which the world is interested, though the interest in the view of Government of India is more vital and direct than that of any other Government which concerns itself with the public health.—Times of India.

THE VICTORY IN THE SUDAN.

Descriptive accounts that have been received from the Sudan of the memorable battle of Gond Friday show that the victory was the most important that has been recorded in that historic part of Africa for many years. It is not to be denied that the power of the Khalifa it has, at sum total, secured. The Dervishes had obliquely given them the choice of battle ground. The defences were in their favour, for they had time to throw up earthworks, which were serious obstacles to the Anglo-Egyptian troops. They had time to rally and rally in the dead of night, to reorganize and to have approached pretty closely the defences before they were observed. The Caucasians and the 11th Southrons had led the way, down the zebra under the hottest fire, and their losses were exceedingly heavy, although the Dervishes fortunately fired high. The Caucasians having got through with openings, in the rear, had only to wait for the Dervishes to be driven into a corner, and were filled with blocks who, with the courage of the fanatic, engaged in a desperate hand-to-hand struggle with our men. The trenches and rifle pits were filled with dead. The rear lighted, however, does not seem to have lasted long. Every section of the Anglo-Egyptian force rallied desperately, coolly, and bravely. The artillery fire appeared to have moved down more rapidly than the British Maxim, assisted by the cavalry, kept in check a force of a thousand Dervish horsemen. While it lasted the combat seems to have been fierce and terrible. No quarter was given or asked for, as is usual when civilization need not fear the uncivilized. The Dervishes would rush on to the point of the bayonet, and then fly, or stand together in hot and terrible fight, to the last man. Others took to flight, and in the pursuit many of them were swept down by the fall of balls.

It was a fight of a special interest in many respects. The British forces displayed their usual pluck and coolness. The Caucasians, it is said, used to stand stock still, and then bring a shot until the head of a Dervish was visible, and then the man went down with a bullet. But the valour and fighting power of the Egyptian troops is particularly noteworthy. Thus was when they would not have had the courage to face the fierce Dervishes but under British command, and, in a few years, they have shown themselves to be the best soldiers in the world, and to be equal to the English in every respect. They are preparing to sell their lives dear. The Dervishes, who as serfs had degenerated into abject specimens of humanity, who resorted to all sorts of devices in order to escape conscription, have become soldiers in the true sense of the word. Before the British entered Egypt it was thought that they would not venture into the interior in order to recruit their children in imitation of the French, who did the same for the Army, and the Egyptians became the most timid and cowardly people, unable to resist the Dervishes whom last week they assisted to crush. Their bravery and fighting power must be put down to the credit of the English, who have given them an interest in the land of their birth, have inspired them with a spirit of patriotism and a desire to win victories.

The congratulations received by the Anglo-Egyptian troops and the officers is well merited. Her Majesty was the first to send her thanks and her congratulations to the gallant men who had the responsibility of leading Egypt, and the Kaiser has sent his hearty congratulations to the British Empire, who himself fought so gallantly in the victory well earned. The Kaiser has complimented both to British arms and to the British nation in that telegram to Sir Frank Lascelles, which will do something, perhaps, to remove the impression he created by another famous telegram. As to testimony of my appreciation of the services of the English troops, I can only say that it is further stated that the Kaiser proposed to send a German officer of high rank to observe the rest of the campaign. That officer will receive a welcome in the British camp, and Anglo-Egyptian soldiers will appreciate the praise of a military potentate. Sir H. Kitchener has proved himself a General of great skill and has done some remarkable ability. His military step has proved that there is no justification for the military criticism that has been passed upon his actions. The Sirdar has never struck a blow without marking certain of victory, and he has not been slow to move. The rapidity of his marches and the sudden attack of the enemy's position have surprised everybody, and he has won the admiration of all. Like a wise commander, he has waited until his preparations have been absolutely complete, and has then swept down upon the enemy like the figure of death.
